PASSAGE 1

Sports and games have been an important part of human society since ancient times. Not only do sports and games keep us healthy and fit, they are an important means of entertainment and physical activity. These help in building our character and also boost our energy and strength. They improve blood circulation. This improves our physical well-being. Besides this, a lot of learning happens when we participate in these events.

Hence, sports and games help in mental growth as well. We learn to compete and lose with grace. We learn how to maintain proper mental balance and deal with difficult situations. We learn to collaborate, compete and develop team spirit in us. Thus, sports and games help us lead happier, healthier and more productive lives.

Several studies have found that there are potential benefits from sports that include the development of healthy physical and social skills, the development of fine motor skills, and improved health and sport-specific fitness in young people. Games provide a competitive channel.

Adults need 150 minutes of moderate aerobic activity each week. This can be accomplished through sports such as tennis, basketball or racquetball. Playing indoor games with family and friends also provides social interaction that helps relieve the stress of daily life. Senior citizens can benefit the most from sports and exercise. These can improve heart functions, balance and flexibility. These ensure better sleep at night, a boost in self-confidence, a better mood, and prevent memory loss. These can also help our reasoning ability and cognitive functions. Playing games strengthens ties and build relationships between parents and the elderly. Education without sports is incomplete. Keeping their value in mind, sports are an important part of academic curricula these days.

PASSAGE 2

When Koki was twelve, she and her mother went to spend part of the year with Koki's maternal grandmother who lived in a lonely old house near the river bed. Her mother was busy all day, cooking and washing clothes, while her grandmother, a round, bouncy little woman, would sit in the sun recounting stories from her own childhood.

Koki would spend the mornings helping her mother, and the afternoons talking to her grandmother. Towards evening the old lady would go indoors, and then Koki would be on her own in the large garden.

The garden had not been looked after too well. It was overrun with semi-wild marigolds, nasturtiums and roses. Koki liked it this way because she could wander about discovering flowers emerging from tall grass and thistles. A wall went sloping down to the river bed. A shallow stream ran along the middle of this otherwise dry water course. During the monsoons it was a rushing torrent, but these days it was a murmuring brook, with little silver fish darting about in the water.

Koki seldom went beyond the garden wall, because across the river bed was the jungle, and animals frequently came down to the water to drink. The wild boar, that were often seen, frightened her. But once she saw a deer, quite close, moving about with supple grace and dignity. It was a chital, a spotted deer. Koki stared at the animal in fascination. The deer must have become conscious of her gaze, for it looked up and stared back at Koki. What the deer saw was a small dark face, half hidden by a lot of loose black hair, and two large brown eyes shining with wonder. The deer and the girl stared at each other for two or three minutes, and then somewhere a twig snapped and the startled deer went bounding away across the stream.
